Investment Analyst

- Research technology companies listed on global stock markets
- Are you an investor; can you identify mispriced opportunities?
- Candidates need not have a financial industry background

Investment Analysts need to be able to develop an understanding of the businesses they research. This is much more than simply describing what the business does. The analyst needs to pinpoint the critical elements of a business that gives rise to its inherent profitability and provide an insight to its prospects over a long period of time. Usually answering these questions involve dealing with a complex and dynamic set of variables. As the most lucrative opportunities in markets involve taking a position against the accepted wisdom of the moment an analyst must be able to think independently.

Successful analysts typically;

- Have a natural inclination to want to understand "how things work"
- Possess strong research skills as the right answers are rarely "presented on a plate"
- Are both persistent and resilient. Markets do not provide many "free lunches"

Within your initial application you should fully demonstrate why you will be a successful investment analyst, your interest in technology and what you have learnt to date.
